Boiled Water and Lemonade,

Lemonade, especially this Summer, should e made with boiling water and then allowed to cool before being iced. In lact, all the water used for ortakt g, or for making any beverage, should be toticil. The instant it bolls it must be poured off, or it will lose the gases which give it a iresh, pleasant taste and become flat and tasteless. It must be poured into perfectly clean vessels, with ticht-fitting covers, and kept in a cool spot till the next day, when it may be cooled still more, if desired, with ice. Now, the ice should not be put into the water, unless it be the manufactured ice, which, having been bolled and filtered before treezing, is entirely free from living organisms. Freezing, alone, does not destroy disease germs; polling does, so that it would be more prudent to use the manufactured ice in water, tea and all other beverages.
